I. To take dishonestly or secretly.

1. trans. To take away dishonestly (portable property, cattle, etc., belonging to another); esp. to do this secretly or unobserved by the owner or the person in charge. Const. from (earlier dativ.).

6. The vapour into which water is converted when heated. In popular language, applied to the visible vapour which floats in the air in the form of a white cloud or mist, and which consists of minute globules or vesicles of liquid water suspended in a mixture of gaseous water and air. (Also sometimes applied to the vapour arising from other liquids when heated.) In modern scientific and technical language, applied only to water in the form of an invisible gas.

The invisible 'steam', in the modern scientific sense, is, when its temperature is lowered, converted into the white vapour called 'steam' in popular language, and this under continued cooling, becomes 'water' in the liquid form.

1. A general name for certain artificially produced varieties of iron, distinguished from those known as 'iron' by certain physical properties, esp. greater hardness and elasticity, which render them suitable as material for cutting instruments, and for various other industrial purposes.

Chemically steel is a nearly pure iron, the proportion of other substances varying from less than 1 to 3 per cent. Formerly 'steel' could be defined as containing more carbon than wrought iron, and less than cast iron; but since about 1860 the name has been extended to certain products containing very little carbon.

Steelbow² (stēlbōw). Sc. Law. Obs. exc. Hist. Forms: 5-6 steel-, 6 stele-, 7 steelbow. [f. STEEL sb.¹ + Bow 3.]

It corresponds to the F. cheptel de fer (see LITTRÉ), lit. 'iron farm-stock', and to early mod. G. stählin rich, eisern vieh (in German Law Latin pecora chalybea, ferrea), and obs. Da. jernfæ. These terms denote the quantity of live stock which a farming tenant receives from his landlord on entering, under a contract to restore the same quantity and value at the end of his tenancy. This is precisely the sense of steelbow, exc. that the Sc. term seems to have been extended to apply to dead as well as live stock. The F. cheptel de fer is also used, like steelbow, for the species of tenure or contract under which cattle are so held by a tenant. In early mod. Ger. there were other legal terms containing the adjs. stählin 'made of steel', eisern 'made of iron', in the figurative sense 'rigidly fixed in amount': e.g. stähline gillt, a fixed regular payment or income: stähline pfünde, a church living subject to no deductions. The figure of speech doubtless comes down from very early Germanic legal formulae; but evidence is wanting. See Schiller Glossarium, s.v. Stal; also Grimm Deutsche Rechtsaltertümer (ed. 4, 1899) II. 131.]

On the assumption that (notwithstanding the late date at which it is recorded) the vb. represents an OE. *stēpan, *stēpan, it would be the formal equivalent of Sw. stōpa, Da. stōbe, Norw. stēppa, to steep (seeds, barley for malting):—O Tent. type *staupjan, perhaps f. *staupo-m (OE. stēap, ON. staup, STOUR) vessel for liquor. Cf. Norw. setja horn i staup = to put corn in steep (see STEEP sb. 1). The mod. Scandinavian words cited coincide in form with a verb meaning to cast down, to cast (metals), to run (candles, etc.) into a mould, which descends from ON. stēppa of the same meaning, a causative of ON. stēpa (once), Sw. stēpa to STROP. It is phonologically impossible that, as is usually supposed, the Eng. word can be an ON. stēppa; and even if it be referred to an OE. *stēpan corresponding to the ON. vb., the development of sense appears less natural on this view than on that suggested above.]

Stem (stem), sb.² Naut. Forms: 1 stefn, stefna or -ne, stemme, 5-6. steme, 6-7 stemme, 7 stemb, 7-8 stemm, 6- stem. [OE. stemma, stefn str. masc. (also stefna wk. masc. or stefne wk. fem.), originally a specific application of STEM sb.¹ in the sense 'tree-trunk'. The nautical use occurs (sometimes with differentiated form) in several Teut. langs.: OFris. stevene (Vfrs. stiftun, Nfrs. stēven), Du., LG. stevan (whence G. stevan; MDn. had also stevē), OS. stamm, ON. stafn, stamm masc. (whence ME. Stam sb.¹), Da. stavn, also (? from LG.) stavn, Sw. (? from LG.) stäf.

After the OE. period the native word does not occur in our quots. until late in the 15th c., though the 14th and 15th c. have several examples of STAM (from the equivalent ON. form) and of the compound FORESTAM. The native form must of course have been preserved in oral tradition alongside the Scandinavian form, which disappears in the 15th c. A few examples of STEVEN are found in Sc. writers of the 16th c.; whether this descends from OE. stefn, or a late adoption from LG. or Du., cannot be determined.

The original conjugation (O Teut. type *stapjan, *stóp-, *stapan-) is completely evidenced only in English and Frisian: OE. steppan, steppan, pa. t. stóp, pa. pple. (be)stapen, corresponds to OFris. steppa* (3rd sing. stept, stapht, subj. stepte), pa. t. stóp, pa. pple. stapen. The present-stem is normally represented also in OHG. stephen (MHG. stepfen), and WFlam.

steppen; the strong pa. t. in OS. stōp and in WFr. stōp, which is the only trace of the strong inflexion surviving in any mod. Teut. dialect. The continental WGer. lang. have a synonymous wk. vb. with pp and without umlaut, (M)LG., (M)Du. stappen, mod. Fris. stappe, OHG. staphōn (MHG., mod. G. stappen):—WGer. stappōjan*, where the doubled p appears to be due to derivation from the sb. WGer. stappōn*—(see STEP sb.); in LG. and Du., however, the history of the form may be complicated with that of the original j-present.

In OE. the normal form stēpan was Anglian, while WS. had the form stappan, the anomalous vowel of which has not been satisfactorily accounted for. In ME. the forms with a are confined to certain southern writers (cf. mod. Somerset staap). The present Sc. stap, recorded from the 17th c., appears to be a late development.

The normal strong pa. t. and pa. pple. survive into the 14th and 15th centuries, but beside them appear two analogical formations: steop, stēpen, app. modelled on the reduplicating verbs (cf. the similar development in MDn. stiep pa. t.); and stap, stappe of uncertain origin. Beside the regular stapen there is also a new pa. pple. stopen. Weak forms are found from the end of the 13th century, and from the 16th century are universal.

The affinities of the Teut. root stap* are uncertain. On the assumption that the form with single p has been altered by some analogy from stapp*, with pp representing Indogermanic pp, possible cognates are OSI. (and Russian) stopa, step, pace, stēpen step, degree.]

Step, var. STAP Sc. and north., stave of a tub.

Step, OE. stēp (earlier stēp-, Northumb. stēp-), corresponding to OFris. stiap-, stiep- (Nfris. stiap-, sjap-, stip-, Wfris. stiep-), MLG. (irreg.) stēf- (mod. LG. stāf-), (MDu. (irreg.) stief-, OHG. stuf- (MHG., mod.G. stief-), ON. stjúp-, (MSw. stjup-, stjuf-, mod.Sw. stjuf-, stjuf-, Da. stif-, stiv-, now superseded by sted-): -OTeut. steupo*-, a Com. Teut. combining element (not recorded in Gothic), prefixed to terms of relationship (as son, father, brother) to form designations for the degrees of affinity resulting from the remarriage of a widowed parent. The primitive sense of the word is indicated by the use of OE. stepbearn, -cild (STEPBAIRN, STEPCILD) for 'orphan', and by the cognates, OE. dstleped bereaved, OHG. stiußen (also ar-, distiußen) to bereave. Etymologically, stepfather (stepmother) might be rendered 'one who becomes a father (mother) to an orphan', and stepson (stepdaughter) 'an orphan who becomes a son (a daughter)' by the marriage of the surviving parent. It is uncertain which of these two applications of the prefix is the original one; all branches of Teut. (exc. Gothic) have both, and also the extended use in stepbrother, stepsister. ON. had shortened forms, stjupa stepmother, stjup-r (mod.Icel. stjúpri) stepson. In Du. and LG., and in later Scandinavian, the p of OTeut. steupo*- is anomalously represented by f instead of p. This is prob. not due to HG. influence, but to assimilation to the following f in the compound stepfather (cf. the early ME. form steffadyr). A solitary OE. example of this anomaly occurs in the form stefdohtor (quot. 912 s.v. STEPDAUGHTER). Occasional forms of the prefix in ME. are stip- (styp-), sti-, ste-, *stap*pe-.

In 1755 Johnson says that stepmother is the only one of the compounds of step- that has survived in general use. At the present day stepfather is hardly less frequently used, and stepson, -daughter, -child, -brother, -sister are by no means rare, while stepdame occurs in somewhat archaic language (chiefly fig.). In the 16th and 17th c. a few writers employed the prefix in nonce-formations which would now seem un-English, as stepdevil, a term of abhorrence for a stepmother; step-duchess, the stepmother of a duke's children; step-lord, one who has the position of a lord without the true lord's affection for his subjects; step-Tully, one who assumes the function of a Cicero. New formations with the prefix, denoting actual relations of affinity, do not appear earlier than the 19th c.; in the latter part of the century they became somewhat common, chiefly as more or less jocular nonce-words, though one or two of them, as step-nephew, -niece, have obtained some currency in serious use. The older compounds of step- are in this Dictionary treated as main words; the following examples illustrate the extended applications of the prefix from the 16th c. onwards.

Stēr, obs. form of STARK, STEER, STIR.

-ster, suffix. (Forms: 1 -istēr, -estēre, later -ystre, -istre, 2-4 -estēre, 4-5 -estir, 5 -ister, 4-7 -star(e), 4-5 -estere, -stere, 4- -ster), corresponding to MLG. (-e)ster, (M)Du. and mod.Fris. -ster, represents a WGer. type -stirjōn, forming feminine agent-nouns, prob. a derivative of the OE -stro- forming nouns of action, as in ON. bakstr masc., act of baking, OHG. galstar neut., incantation.

The existence of the suffix is not attested for High German, OS. or OFris.; the supposed examples sometimes cited, OHG. wagastria lance, agalastra (OS. agastria) magpie, OS. hamstra marmot, ramestra some plant, are very doubtful; even if the suffix be formally identical with the agential suffix, it has not the same function. In Du. -ster regularly forms feminine agent-nouns corresponding to masculines in -er, e.g. schrijfster fem. of schrijver a writer. In MLG., and in mod.Fris., although most of the nouns in -ster are fem., several occur as masc., e.g. MLG. bedriegerster deceiver, NFr. greueter gravedigger, wäuster weaver.

In the original types of the formation the suffix was prob. preceded by the thematic vowel of the word to which it was attached, thus becoming -astirjōn, -istirjōn, -stirjōn. In the historical forms, however, there is no evidence of this (unless in the OE. byrdistre: see below); in Du. and Fris. the suffix is -ster without prefixed vowel; in MLG. usually -ster, sometimes -estēre, app. merely for euphony. In OE. it is -estēre, which does not produce umlaut, though it is often added to a stem containing an umlaut-vowel.

In OE. -estēre was freely used to form fem. agent-nouns, in exactly the same manner in which -ere (-ER) was used to form masc. agent-nouns. Thus it was appended to the pres.-stems of verbs, as in lærestre female teacher, hoppestre female dancer, and to certain monosyllabic nouns of action as in sangestre songstress, seamestre sempstress, lybbeestre female poisoner or witch. In a few instances fem. agent-nouns were formed by the substitution of -estēre for the masc. suffix -a (-fon-), as in bigengestre fem. of bigenga cultivator, worshipper, webbestre (WEBSTER) beside webbe as fem. of webba weaver. Lattēow, leader, functionally an agent-n. though without agential suffix, gave rise to a fem. lattelwestre. An anomalous formation is huntigestre (instead of huntestre*) huntress, which occurs once as a variant reading for huntege.

In OE. the suffix may be said to have retained its original function, for the few instances in which it is used as a masculine are renderings of Latin designations of men exercising functions which among the English were peculiar to women, as byrdistre embroiderer (gl. blaciarius, primiculiarius), bacestre baker (gl. pistor), seamestre tailor (gl. sartor), wæsestre washer (gl. fullo).

In northern ME., however, perh. owing to the frequent adoption by men of trades like weaving, baking, tailoring, etc., the suffix came very early to be used, indiscriminately with -ER, as an agential ending irrespective of gender; thus in the Cursor Mundi (a 1300) demestre (see DEMPSTER) appears instead of demere (DEEMER), a judge, bemestre instead of bemer a trumpeter. It is probable that -ster was often preferred to -er as more unambiguously referring to the holder of a professional function, as distinguished from the doer of an occasional act. In Scotland, baxter and webster survived as masculines down to the 19th c. The only word of this formation that in Scotland has remained exclusively feminine is SEWSTER.

In the south the suffix continued to be predominantly feminine throughout the ME. period. The OE. formations, baxter, seamster, tapster, were in southern English usually feminine before 1500; many new designations of occupation, originally feminine, arose in ME., as bellringestre, hordestre treasurer (Wintney Rule St. Bened. 13th c.), holestre fem. of holere commander (Ayenbite), brewster, dyester, ilister, throuster, huckster; also spinster, which alone of the group has survived (though with change of sense) solely as a feminine. A few feminines in -estēre were formed to correspond to masculines in -ere of French origin: fruitestere, tumbestere, tumblestere, wæfester. As a feminine suffix of purely agential import, -ster was in the 14th c. still used for new formations by some writers, but was generally replaced by the French -eresse. Thus MS. Bodl. 277 of the Wyclif Bible has chesister, daunster, dwellster, weilster, where other copies have cheseresse, daunseresse (leperesse), dwelleresse, weileresse.

From the 16th c. onwards the older words in -ster, so far as they survived, have been regarded as masculines, and several of them have given rise to feminines in -ess, as backstress, seamstress, songstress, huckstress. In the modern English period the suffix has been very productive, but it is doubtful whether any of the new formations are really derived from verbs; in every instance in which this would be formally possible there is a sb. of the same form as the vb., and the derivative is (in present feeling at least) associated rather with the sb. than the vb. so in gamester, rhymester (late 16th c.), druggster (1611; but cf. druggister), and the much later dabster, jokester, punsster, trickster, tipster. The formation here imitates that of trade designations; hence the disparaging sense, e.g. in rhymester, jokester, as compared with rhymet, joker. An anomalous use is that in rubster (17th c.), something used to rub with.

In the 16th c. two formations on adjs. occur: youngster (after which oldster was formed later) and lewdster.

Stereobate (stériobát). Arch. [= F. stéréobate, It. stereobate, ad. L. stereobata, ad. Gr. στερεοβάτης, f. στερεός solid + -βάτης as in στυλοβάτης STYLOBATE.] A solid mass of masonry serving as a base for a wall or a row of columns. (See also quots.)

The term occurs only once in ancient use (Vitruvius III. iii). Vitruvius explains it as a massive wall built from the ground as a support for a row of columns. Modern writers (Latin in the 15-16th c., Italian, French, and English) have used it in various applications. According to some, stereobate is the generic term for a basement, either under a wall or a row of columns, and a 'stylobate' is a stereobate of which the superstructure is columnar. Others restrict stereobate to the basement of a wall, as distinguished from stylobate, a basement under a row of columns. Others, again, use stereobate for the whole basement, and stylobate for the upper portion of this, which is added when there are columns.

1836 PARKER Gloss. Archit. (1840) 206 Stylobate, Stereobate, the basement or substructure of a temple below the columns. 1840 HOSKING Archit. in Encycl. Brit. (ed. 7) III. 470 Stereobate, a basement. It is sought to make a distinction between this term and Stylobate q. v., by restricting the latter to its real import, and applying stereobate to a basement in the absence of columns. 1875 Encycl. Brit. II. 441/1 [Italian Architecture.] A basement is either a low stereobate or a lofty story, according as it is intended to support a single ordinance [etc.].

Hence Stereobatic a., pertaining to or having the character of a stereobate.

Stereochemistry (stériokēmístri). [f. STEREO- + CHEMISTRY.] That department of chemistry which deals with theoretical differences in the relative position in space of atoms in a molecule, in relation to differences in the optical and chemical properties of the substances.

7-8 stuart; 5-8 stewart, 4- stewart. [OE. stizward, stigward, f. stig of uncertain meaning + ward keeper, WARD sb.]

The word is not found in any MS. earlier than the 11th c., and the form stizward, though certainly the original, is recorded only in a late transcript. The first element is most probably OE. stig a house or some part of a house (cf. stig-wita house-dweller); this is doubtless cogn. with stigu Stv sb. and stigan to climb (Stv v.), but there is no ground for the assumption that stizward originally meant 'keeper of the pig-sties'.

The Eng. title is quoted by Froissart in the OF. form estuard. The rare ON. stioardr is adopted from OE.

Since the 16th c. the definitions of the word have often been influenced by the supposed etymologies stead + ward and stow + ward.

3. a. (Lord High) Steward or Great Steward of England. Recorded since the 15th cent. as: The title of a high officer of state, the earlier senescallus Angliae. Since the accession of Henry IV this officer has been appointed only on the occasion of a coronation, at which he presides, or for the trial of a peer, which takes place in the Court of the Lord High Steward if Parliament be not sitting.

Originally this office seems to have carried little more than the privilege of waiting on the king's table, especially on state occasions. But it soon became hereditary in the earls of Leicester, and powers similar to those of the French seneschal were claimed for it by Simon de Montfort. This development was checked by the attainer of Simon, and the office finally fell in to the crown by the accession of its holder Henry IV.

b. (Lord High) Steward of Scotland. Hist.

The first officer of the Scottish King in early times; he had control of the royal household, great administrative powers, and the privilege of leading the army into battle. The office, described as senescallatus Scotiae in a charter of Malcolm IV, 1158, fell in to the crown upon the accession of Robert the Steward as Robert II, whence the name of the royal house of Stuart; but the title was given to the heir-apparent until the Union. Great Steward of Scotland is now a title of the Prince of Wales.

Occas. used for: The practice of writing a prose text in lines of nearly equal length corresponding to divisions in the sense. Also, stichoi collectively.

[OE. stician wk. v., f. Teut. root stik-* to pierce, be sharp (whence STICK, STITCH sbs.): Indogermanic stig-* (: steig-*) found in Gr. στίγειν (-: stigi-*) to prick, στίγη, στίγμα prick, point (see STIGMA, L. instigare to spur on, INSTIGATE; also with nasal infix, in Goth. stiggan to thrust, L. -stinguere to prick (distinguere to distinguish); and without initial s in Skr. tij- to be sharp, tiṣṭi sharp. The Teut. root chiefly appears in the altered form stek-* (stak-; stæk-), as in the Com. WGer. strong verb stekan* to prick, thrust; see STEAK v. The formal equivalent of OE. stician* (WGer. type stikōjan*, stekōjan*, prob. denominative) occurs in OHG. stehhōn to prick, stab, cut the throat of; a parallel formation (WGer. type stikkjan*, also prob. denominative) is found as (M)Du., (M)LG. stikken to prick, pierce, stab, also to embroider (Sw. sticka, Da. stikke from LG.), OHG. stichehen in the same senses (MHG., mod.G. sticken to embroider).

It is impossible accurately to separate the history of this originally weak verb from that of the originally strong STEAK v.² The latter was from an early period sometimes conjugated weakly, while on the other hand the strong inflexions of stiek became associated with stiek, moreover, in the 16th c. formed a new strong pa. t. and pa. ppl. stuck (cf. dig, dug). It is therefore often doubtful to which verb forms like stuck, stoken, should be referred. Further, in some northern dialects the ME. stike is normally represented by stiek, and therefore coincides (at least graphically) with STEAK v.² The wk. form sticked remained in somewhat common use until the 17th c., and still survives (in certain senses) in Sc. and various dialects (see Eng. Dial. Dict.).

I. To pierce, thrust.

1. trans. To stab, pierce, or transfix with a thrust of a spear, sword, knife, or other sharp instrument; to kill by this means, more explicitly to stick to death. Also refl. Not now in dignified use.

A. adj.
1. Motionless; not moving from one place, stationary; also, remaining in the same position or attitude, quiescent. a. as predicate or complement. In stand, sit, lie still the word may be taken either as adj. or adv. In OE., however, there is evidence that in these collocations it was sometimes adv., and no evidence that it was ever adj., the constant form being stille (which always admits of being regarded as adv.), never stille, which would be the proper form of the adj., when the subj. is fem. sing. or neut. pl. Further, in OS. and OHG. the adv. stille, not the adj., is used with the verb 'to stand'. These phrases are therefore treated under STILL adv. 1.

Stingy (sti'ndʒi), a. Also 7 stingie. [Perh. f. STING sb. 2 or v. 1 + -y.]

On the assumption that the sb. represents OE. sting—stungi*—, the pronunciation (sti'ndʒi) is explicable. It is possible that some of the examples under sense 1 represent a distinct word, pronounced (sti'ngi), which is still occasionally heard in colloquial use. For the current sense 4, cf. the dial. stingy of the same meaning (Eng. Dial. Dict. i).

VI. A fund, store.

The senses grouped under this head are not found in the other Teut. languages except by adoption from English. Their origin is obscure, and possibly several different lines of development may have blended. Thus the application of the word to a trader's capital may partly involve the notion of a trunk or stem (branch I) from which the gains are an outgrowth, and partly that of 'fixed basis' or 'foundation' (branch II); cf. FUNK. Sense 47 may be derived immediately from that of 'money-box', and have given rise to uses coincident with senses of different origin. The application to cattle is primarily a specific use of the sense 'store', but the notion of 'race' or 'breed' (sense 3) has had some share in its development.

52. The subscribed capital of a trading company, or the public debt of a nation, municipal corporation, or the like, regarded as transferable property held by the subscribers or creditors, and subject to fluctuations in market value. Also, in particularized sense, a kind of stock, a particular fund in which money may be invested.

In expressions like to buy or sell stocks, the word may be partly an application of sense 42, 'tally'. Cf. quot. 1714 under that sense.

In modern British use the application of the word is narrowed; the subscribed capital of a public company is called shares when it is divided into portions of uniform amount, and stock when any desired amount may be bought or sold. In Irish use, also, when there is no specific indication, stock is usually taken to refer to those portions of the National Debt, the principal of which is not repayable, the government being pledged only to the payment of interest in perpetuity.

Stole (stōl), sb. 2. Also 5-6 stools, 6 stools, stovle. [Commonly identified with Stole sb. 1, to which the unauthenticated sense of 'royal robe' is assigned. But there seems to be little doubt that the 'stole chamber', served by the Groom or Yeoman of the Stole, was originally the room containing the king's close-stool, and that the word is properly a variant of Stool sb. 1. As, however, the word as thus used was for centuries entirely dissociated from stool, and latterly had a different spelling, it is necessary to treat it separately.

In accounts of coronation ceremonies the king is said to have worn an ornament resembling a stole (Stole sb. 2); but it does not appear that this was actually called a 'stole' until modern times. The view that the Groom of the Stole derived his designation from this ornament is quite improbable.

Sir H. Nicolas's supposition, that the 'stole' was a kind of packing-chest, is a mistaken inference from the stole and male being mentioned together in certain documents.]
